FOREWORD

"Everything looms pleasant through the softening haze of time. Even the sadness that is past seems sweet. Our childhood days look very merry to us now, all nutting, hoop, and gingerbread. The snubbings and toothaches and the Latin verbs are all forgotten—the Latin verbs especially.

"Yes, it is the brightness, not the darkness, that we see when we look back. The sunshine casts no shadows on the past. The road that we have traversed stretches very fair behind us. We see not the sharp stones. We dwell but on the roses by the wayside, and the strong briars that stung us are, to our distant eyes, but gentle tendrils waving in the wind. God be thanked that it is so—that the ever-lengthening chain of memory has only pleasant links, and that the bitterness and sorrow of today are smiled at on the morrow."—Jerome K. Jerome.

Alma Mater

Hail, Wesleyan, thou emblem of all that is grand—
The noblest, the greatest, in all our fair land!
Thine ideals are honored—thy name always blest—
A fountain of knowledge, the oldest and best.

A star in the dark is thy glorious past;
Forever and ever thy glory shall last.
Upholding thine ideals, thy daughters will be
True, faithful, and loyal, dear Welseyan, to thee!

BOOK ONE

THE COLLEGE

"Come, for the soft, low sunlight calls."

"Dear pal, we re-ascend the steps
Where many happy, youthful feet have trod."

"Thy music sets my world at ease
In satisfying symphonies."

"Wild flowers are fringing the dusty lanes."

"These shades are still the abodes of gladness"

"They all look fresh, as if our Lord
But yesterday had finished them."

"Still it whispered promised pleasure,
And bade the lovely scenes at distance hail!"

"I cannot but remember such things were
Which were most precious to me."

To Wesleyan

Across the fourscore winters that have fled
An echo comes to us of voices dead,
Thy first fair daughters who in memory still
Live on, O Wesleyan, on thy ancient hill!
Thy towers where the past is ling'ring on
Still breathe a fragrance of the years long gone;
And as we view the scenes our hearts hold fast,
The living, lasting glories of thy past,
We honor each tradition that appears—
O thou great Wesleyan of the yesteryears!

The picture fades and vanishes away,
We see, instead, thy beauties of today,
Thy lawns and gardens decked with roses fair,
The spirit of true friendship resting there;
The duties we have answered, and the score
Of pleasures we have known within thy door;
Nor time, nor change, whatever change may be
Can ever touch our loyalty to thee;
More blest than in the years that passed away,
O thou great Wesleyan of the present day!

From out the vale of dreams we cannot see
There comes a whisper of the years to be,
A promise that thy future shall be far,
Far greater than thy past and present are!
A voice that says thy fame shall be unfurled
And spread abroad through all the listening world,
And from thy history of the long ago,
And from our loyalty to days we know,
Our dreams and longings ever turn to thee,
Thou greater Wesleyan of the years to be!

Senior Song

(Tune: "Ever Since You Went Away")

Red and White of 'Twenty-one,
When your journey here was done,
The plans and ideals you began,
Your colors and the Ku Klux Klan
Fell to us as you passed by—
We will always hold them high!

Class of 'Twenty-one to you,
Now we give our promise true
That though you are not here to see,
The Tri-K still shall always be
Safe with us; whate'er betide,
It shall always be our guide!

JUNIOR PROM, '24

The Winds of Spring

Winter winds, with icy breath and frosty fingers,
Whistling keen a piercing dirge that ever lingers,
Wrap around the earth.

Summer winds are lazy. Softly they are blowing,
Droning tales of meadowlarks and brooklets flowing,
Full of lazy mirth.

Autumn winds of spice and fruit and grain are chanting,
Azure skies they sing and mellow sunlight slanting,
Harvests without dearth.

Yet winds of spring
My rapture bring.
Their melodies hold everything—
The winter whistle, summer drone
And autumn chant. In every tone
A symphony they sing.

The White and Gold

Titania's sprites on a morning of spring,
With the aid of God's wise hand of love
Guiding them ever on flowery wing,
Took a piece of the mist from above.

With the pot of gold from the rainbow's end
And a brush of Psyche's soft hair,
To the far horizon these elves did bend
And painted a sunrise there.

To the gossamer ends of the fairy mist
They tied a bright ray of light,
And that's the beginning, so some folks insist,
Of the Sophomore's gold and white.

As the sunrise stands for hope and trust,
And the mist doth beauty enfold,
So our banner means all of these three to us,
Dear colors of white and of gold!

MRS. ROBERTSON tipped the porter, took off her hat, and settled herself in her section with a sigh of content and the reflection that she lived at the end of the earth and had the best husband in the world. The first reflection was due to the fact that it is three days' travel from Jacksonville to New York—a whole twenty-four more than from Charleston, which was still home in spite of twenty years spent in Florida. The second was the result of John's parting gift—a one hundred dollar bill—"not to spend on the children, nor to lend to 'Bob,' but to buy something just for herself."

Her thoughts were in a whirl of purchasings which would have spent many times the hundred dollars when she was interrupted by a low-pitched feminine voice.

"Excuse me, but have you any soda?"

Now there is a class of women in this world to whom their cureall is the open sesame to their hearts. Mrs. Robertson was one of these. Years before she had been convinced that all her ills sprang from coffee and drank two cups at each meal because it was to be her last. Later fresh air became her cureall. But today it was soda. This may have accounted to Mrs. Robertson's ardent air of sympathy. She rushed to her bags.

"Indigestion? I have it always, but soda is a sure cure. A teaspoonful in a glass of water. You are across the aisle?"

Three days may be a long time. Certainly long enough for two women traveling alone to become fairly well acquainted. Mrs. Robertson felt that she had an ideal companion. The stranger shared her respect for soda, was quiet, a good listener to her continual chatter, rather dependent in contrast to her confidence.

They breakfasted, lunched and dined in each other's company. When Mrs. Robertson lost her glasses, her pocketbook, her magazine, the stranger always knew just where to lay her hands on it. As. Mrs. Robertson wrote John: "She is entirely charming and has made this tiresome trip pleasant for me."

The third morning found them breakfasting together.

"It's my son, 'Bob,' I'm going to see," Mrs. Robertson confided. "He's gone and gotten engaged to some girl in New York. I don't like it. Seems to me his home girls are the sort for him. But you never can tell about a stranger. 'Bob's' gifted and high-strung and I'd like him to have a wife I could be sure was doing right by him. Being a mother, I guess you can understand the way I feel about it."

It seemed that Mrs. James could.

"Yes, even more than being a mother. My daughter is going to marry some man she has met up here. She is a writer on a paper, and I hate to see her give it up for a man who probably isn't worthy of her and won't understand her gifts."

"Yes," Mrs. Robertson went on. "I see that you really do know. Really, gifted children are a responsibility, don't you think? 'Bob' is an illustrator and is doing so well." An interruption in the form of a waiter came then with the bill, but Mrs. Robertson was not interrupted. She chattered on.

"Where is my pocketbook? I know I brought it."

Her friend told her.

"It's in that chair beside you, I think."

"So it is," the irresponsible Mrs. Robertson went on. "These diners certainly do make up big bills. It's entirely foolish to pay so much for one's breakfast. Are you ready to go back to our car?"

For an hour Mrs. Robertson kept up a rapid fire of conversation. She gleaned two facts from Mrs. James during that time—her destination, her mother's home in a small New York village; and, finally, that it was time for her to tidy up before leaving the train.

"I wish you'd hold this," she requested Mrs. Robertson, extending her pocketbook. "I won't be long, and I don't want the worry of it in the dressing room."

Mrs. Robertson took it and smiled back at her as she departed.

Perhaps a psychologist could explain what happened next. Certainly a layman couldn't have. Mrs. Robertson was a very respectable citizen. Never before in her life had she opened anything belonging to someone else, but suddenly she felt that she must open that pocketbook.

Frenziedly she turned to her own pocketbook. No, John had advised her to put it separately from her other money and she had put it behind the little mirror. It wasn't there.

She had never believed much in these refined thieves who haunted public places, but she had read of them and they were always fascinating. Always they were charmingly innocent and helpless, but she would outwit this one.

The woman had actually thought that she was so green that she had given her the pocketbook with her own hundred dollar bill in it. With a satisfied smile, Mrs. Robertson removed the bill from its resting place to its old location behind the little mirror.

When that creature came back Mrs. Robertson's gay flow of conversation had frozen. She merely said, "Your pocketbook—" and, although she had meant to ask the woman to write to her, her final "good-bye" was more than frigid.

It was only an hour before arrival in New York was due. She must look nice for "Bob." He must not think that she looked small-town and old. Mrs. Robertson loved to be told that she looked like "Bob's" sister. She decided to go manicure her nails now. She was looking her best when, followed by a red cap with her shiny bag, she rushed into "Bob's" arms. "Bob" was tall and handsome and blonde and she was proud of him. His deep voice mumbled his greetings through her hair.

" 'Mums,' I'm so glad to see you. You look younger than ever. Cicely wanted to come, but she decided that you'd want to spend the afternoon with just me. But she is coming to dinner with us tonight. 'Mums,' you'll love her."

"Mums' " lips tightened and she didn't think she would. But she did. That evening when "Bob" brought Cicely to his mother's room Mrs. Robertson looked down on a shyly smiling girl, very straight and very slender, with a firm, cordial handshake and a demure air of adoration toward "Bob."

"I didn't want to butt in, 'Mums'," she declared in soft Southern accents, "but 'Bob' is so proud of his mother and wanted to show her off so much that I couldn't deny him. Isn't he a dear?"

After one swift stab of jealousy at "Bob's" look of possessive pride, Mrs. Robertson felt a rush of relief; for Cicely was not pretty—only sweet. Her orange evening cloak set off a nut-brown complexion whose sameness of color was broken by a wide scarlet mouth and shining eyes; while brown bobbed hair waved about a face with irregular but piquant features. No, Cicely was not pretty, but her smile was fascinating with scintillating charm. And Cicely appreciated "Bob," so Mrs. Robertson took her to her heart, literally and figuratively. Then, holding her at arm's length, Mrs. Robertson exclaimed:

"And what part of South Carolina are you from?"

Cicely laughed.

"Mother is a New Yorker, but dad's a Charlestonian. I lived there until a year ago, when I moved here. You're a Charlestonian, too."

Cicely had come into the flock. Dinner was a gay, intimate affair with laughter in the candlelight. Very late good-byes were said with plans of lunch at Cicely's day after tomorrow and trousseau shopping next day. It was the shopping that convinced Mrs. Robertson that Cicely not only belonged to the flock, but was a kindred spirit. Their tastes and their ideas of essentials were entirely the same, she wrote John in a letter demanding commendation for outwitting the clever thief.

On the lunch day Cicely met them at the door of her diminutive apartment, her eyes shining and happiness singing in her voice. "Mother came in unexpectedly from grandmother's today. I did so want you to know her. Isn't it wonderful?"

She had ushered them into the living room and was taking their hats when a cold, severe voice interrupted.

"Cicely, is that the mother of the man to whom you are engaged?"

Mrs. Robertson turned and met the eyes of her late traveling companion.

"Yes, mother. Mrs. Robertson, my mother, Mrs. ——."

Both women spoke in one sentence as in one voice.

Mrs. Robertson declared: " 'Bob,' this woman is a thief."

Mrs. James stated: "This woman is a thief, Cicely."

There were two cries: "Mums!" from "Bob," and "Mother!" from Cicely.

"I told you, Cicely," Mrs. James told her daughter, "about the woman who took that hundred dollar bill which Charles gave me to buy something just for myself?"

"There now, 'Bob'," Mrs. Robertson grieved to her son. "She not only takes my money, but accuses me of taking hers and pretends that her husband is as good to her as John is to me."

Being a mere man, "Bob" tried to bring reason into the stormy session. "It's only some stupid mistake somewhere. Of course neither of you would steal anything. Let's have lunch and then—"

Three angry women turned on him.

" 'Bob,' it may be only a mistake, but under my roof your own mother has called my mother a thief and I'll have to ask her to apologize."

Cicely's voice was full of tears.

"Eat, indeed," her mother declared. "Do you think I'd eat with a thief who calls me one?"

"Eat those women's food!" Mrs. Robertson fumed. "No, indeed. Nor will I apologize. I am like Lord Chesterfield. I neither give nor take apologies. Come, 'Bob'."

Bob's allegiance was divided.

" 'Mums.' Cicely," he pleaded.

" 'Bob,' are you coming or—" 'Mums' demanded.

"There is no place for you here, 'Bob'," was Cicely's reply.

"Bob" fled.

Four days followed in which three women wept and one man stormed. Virtue in a woman is to be commended, but a feeling of virtue is to be exceeded only by a feeling of martyrdom in condemnation. And outside of working hours "Bob" had both feelings to contend with in three women. And, being a man, he flew shuttle-like from his mother to his fiancee and her mother—and stormed.

The fifth morning Mrs. Robertson lay sulking in bed. She heard "Bob" fumbling about in the bathroom. Suddenly a whistled bar from the spring song startled her into an upright position. Then the music ceased, even more suddenly than it had begun. So that was the way he felt about his own mother being called a thief. She would show him. Her head was buried in a pillow and she was weeping martyredly when "Bob" came to bid her good-bye. She heard him tiptoe away after knocking twice and trying the door knob.

A little before noon Mrs. Robertson rose, red-eyed, and dressed herself for lunch with her son. Lunch time came and went, but no "Bob." Finally, in desperation she called the office. Mr. Robertson had not been in all day. Mrs. Robertson was really frightened. She went to "Bob's" room. Everything was quite as usual there. The maid had made his bed, his shirt lay in the seat of a chair, his trousers were laid on the back of a chair to keep the crease. She had taught him that herself. On the chiffonnier she noted a letter stamped with two-cent stamps and marked special. Mrs. Robertson again yielded to the impulse she had felt on the train. The letter began:

"Dearest 'Bob'—

"As you say, I know 'Mums' isn't a thief, just as you know mother isn't. 'Mums' and I got well enough acquainted for me to know that. It's some dreadful mistake. I don't know what we can do about it, but I am very unhappy and I can see that you are. I am taking the usual bus to work this morning. If you think we can get anywhere by talking it over. Always, "CICELY."

It was that woman's daughter. That was why "Bob" had whistled that morning. She had forbidden "Bob" to have anything to do with her. She went out, still holding the letter in her hand. She met the maid in the hall coming to announce a caller. She went down immediately. It was Cicely's mother and she was waiting in the reception room.

"Can you tell me where Cicely is?" she demanded.

"No," answered Mrs. Robertson, dully. "Only this," and extended the note.

Mrs. James only glanced at it and burst out:

"Plotting against her own mother with the son of a thief," and sat down, weeping.

Again the maid came, this time bearing a telegram.

"If you'll excuse me," Mrs. Robertson said coldly, "I'll read this while you gain your self-control. Perhaps then we can discuss something sensibly."

The telegram read:

"JOHN."

Supreme silence reigned a few moments, except for the sobbing of Mrs. James.

"Her bill," Mrs. Robertson muttered then.

Determinedly she turned to the other woman.

"Mrs. James, I am an opinionated fool, but I am a repentant one and I hope that you'll forgive me. I left my own bill at home. And our poor children. Can't you forgive m-me?"

Mrs. Robertson had joined the weeping. Neither woman knew exactly how long it was before they heard Cicely's unsteady voice in the hall inquiring:

"Is my mother here?"

They were crying in each other's arms then, woman-like. Mrs. Robertson wiped her eyes as "Bob" and Cicely entered the door and handed them John's telegram. Together they read it. "Bob!" laughed and turned to the two moist-eyed mothers.

"We were rather dreading this, but we were unhappy and took things into our own hands and got married. We couldn't see any way to straighten things out. It looks to me as though nothing has been hurt, except a lot of feelings and you all have had a repentance party over that."

Both mothers cried: "In spite of my positive commands."

And there ensued another period of weeping and kissing and hugging. Then Mrs. Robertson rose to the occasion.

"You children deserve a honeymoon. I want to give you my hundred dollar bill to help you have it on. I couldn't ever use it. Now, Mrs. James, your bill is upstairs. If you'll come up I'll give it to you."

"And I'll give it to the children!" Mrs. James asserted as they went out.

"Aren't they precious and funny and small town-y?" Cicely asked, streaking "Bob's" blue-clad shoulder with tears and powder. "Aren't they dear?"

Down past the years, that are few after all,

You can find it again if you will—
For no matter how old in your manners you are,
At heart you're a little girl still.

For a moment or two, then O schoolmate,
Come with me, hand in hand,
Back to the spot where the day-dreams wait,

Every fairy-tale maiden of "once-on-a-time,"
With a heart that beat loyal and true,
Sat within her great castle, or humble abode,
And waited and watched—for she knew
That a prince in bright armor would ride o'er the land,
With a glittering, gold-hilted sword in his hand,
To slay all of the dragons and take her away
To be happy for aye!

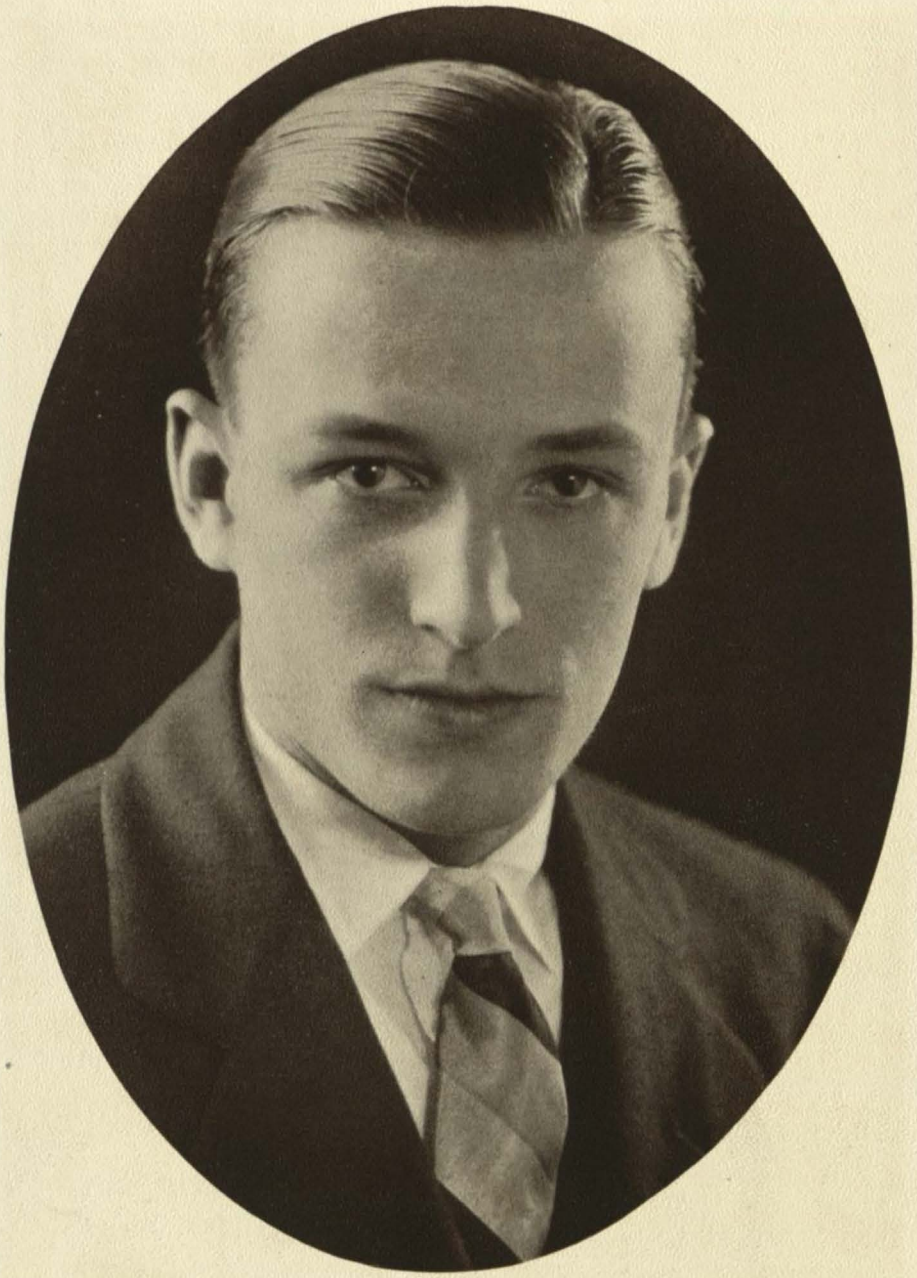

Every really-true maiden of modern-day times,
Like the princess of long, long ago,
Sits and dreams through the hours on wintry eves
In the flickering firelight's glow,
For she knows that a prince with his love in his eyes,
And a heart where a pledge of deep loyalty lies,
Will come sometime to woo her and take her away
To be happy for aye!

PROLOGUE

My good people, please turn your attention this way
And hear what the dignified Seniors now say—
The stunt we presented on last college night,
We are forced to admit, was a little bit light.
And we sigh as we think that our stunts of the past
Never gave to the world anything that would last!
Ah! If we'd had the brains that seniority brings,
We had ne'er spent our time on such frivolous things!
But at last, having reached such a dignified age,
We've decided to prove a great truth on this stage.
Our college has made a most awful mistake
('Tis an error that colleges frequently make).
We have found, by a glance at the last catalogues,
That all literature has just gone to the dogs!
Why, good sir, your own daughter is reading Shakespeare!
And, good Madam, your girl is perusing Lanier!
And since learning has reached such a terrible state
Something must be done now ere it shall be too late!
If some person would stir up a new renaissance!
If the world would just turn from these Shakespeares and Kants
And go back to those noble old classics again
That came from Horatio Alger's great pen!
And our stunt will prove to you in less than a minute
That, compared with H. Alger, Shakespeare wasn't in it!

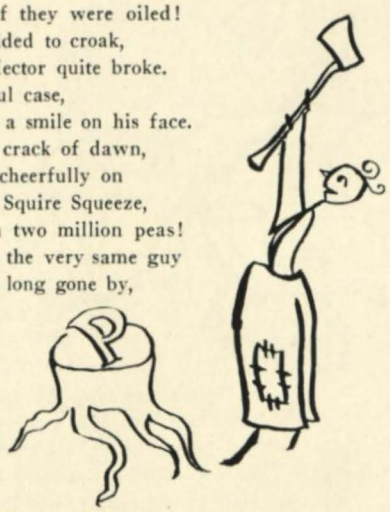

(Scene I. In a Small Town, Dunbar)

In a rickety shack in the town of Dunbar
Lived H. Hector Ham and his poor widowed ma.
And both Hector and mama were starved to death quite

As a Wesleyan maiden on steak and grits night!
For no matter how hard the two toiled and they moiled,
Their dimes slipped away just as if they were oiled!
And the mortgage, pa, when he decided to croak,
Left upon the old place, kept poor Hector quite broke.
But he never complained at his pitiful case,
And he wore his patched pants with a smile on his face.
And he got up each day at the first crack of dawn,
Bade farewell to his ma, and went cheerfully on
To chop peas in the field of the old Squire Squeeze,
Who paid Hector ten cents for each two million peas!
And the Squire, you must know was the very same guy
Who lent Hector's pa money in days long gone by,

And he never forgot it. Each day and each night,
He pulled out the mortgage with sneers of delight,
And he hissed, "I will foreclose, and turn them out yet,
Then that obstinate widow will wed me, I bet!"
Now the squire had one son, young Cecil D. Squeeze,
And the father and son were as like as two peas.
Cecil hated to work, but he lost lots of sleep
Trying to figure out ways to make Hector feel cheap.

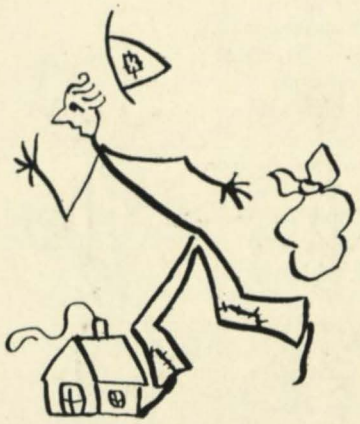

He would sit on the fence while "Hec" chopped 'round the plants,
And say, "Goody, you haven't got bell-bottom pants!"
And our hero would turn in his sweet, gentle way,
And reply, "Is this not the most beautiful day?"
Every evening he took home his little thin dimes,
Never spending a penny on shows or good times;
And his ma, she dragged out all the warmed-over food,
And "Hec" swallowed it down, and said, "Ah, that was good!"
And so things went along in their usual way,
And our hero got poorer and poorer each day,
And he tried to save money, but all was in vain,
And at last he decided he must use his brain,
So alone he doped out a most noble scheme, which
Was to go to the city and make himself rich!

And of course, the poor widow was sad that her child
Must go off to the city so wicked and wild,
But she knew it must be, so she helped her dear lad
Pack three socks and a shirt, which were all that he had!
And with councils and warnings too lengthy to tell,
And with sobbing and sniffing, she bade him farewell.
Now, "Hec" hadn't a nickel to pay his train fare,
And was too good to cheat, so he footed it there.

(Scene II. New York City)

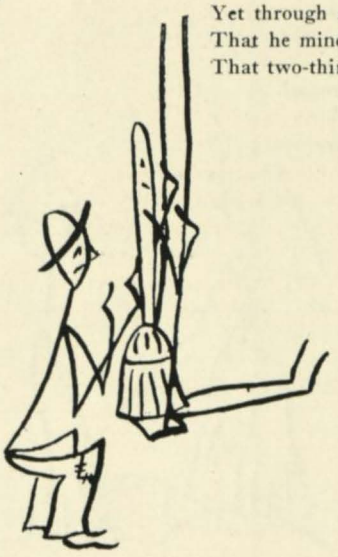

On an evening so rainy that it was a pity
Our hero came dragging it into the city.
And he gazed at the giant sky-scrapers and said,
"Ah, if only my heart were as light as my head!"
All his worldly possessions he pulled from his pocket—
Two peanuts, three bits, and his grandmother's locket!

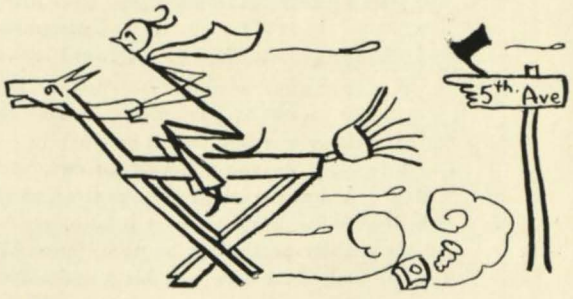

Far be it from Hector, however, to sigh,
He knew that his courage would win by and by,
So he wandered around till he stumbled, by chance,
On a boarding house where you don't pay in advance.
He resolved to himself that his fortune he'd seek,
And be richer than Henry Ford in a week!
When he started next day at the first crack of dawn
To look out for a job, his last two bits were gone!
And for once in his life he was blue, and no bluffing,
For what now was to keep him from starving to nothing?
All at once, on the pavement right under his eyes,
Lay an object that knocked him coo-coo with surprise!
A purse! Hector opened it up in a minute!
Thirty thousand in nickels and dimes lay within it!
"Aha!" you are saying, "Our hero has risen
To wealth!" But the money, you know, wasn't his'n,
So Hector tore after the bald-headed guy
That he'd seen just a moment before passing by,
And he puffed and he blew as he held out the dough,
Saying, "Mister, I'm sorry I bothered you so!"
And the old codger, wishing our hero to thank
Gave him quite a swell job sweeping floors in the bank.
And young Hector, a-sweeping and saving as well
Would have got along fine if he hadn't of fell
In love with the rich old man's golden-haired girl,
Whose name, we'll inform you, was Genevieve Pearl.
But she turned up her nose when he came in the room,
Why, his life occupation was swinging a broom!
And "Hec" worried until he was almost a thread,
And he wished with each stroke of the broom he was dead!

Yet through all of his trials, let it be understood
That he minded his business—he cleaned up so good
That two-thirds of the people who came in the bank
Slipped and broke their old necks and had Hector to thank!
But one day, as our hero was on his way home,
All his thoughts to his dream-girl had started to roam,
When a terrible clattering caused him to look.
Ah! A runaway horse coming bookity-book
Down Fifth avenue! And, though we tremble to show it,
In his path stood our "Jenny," and she did not know it!

Is he going to step on fair Genevieve Pearl?
Is he going to make her a little dead girl?
No indeed! Hector flies, ere the words can be said
And drags Genevieve off by the hair of her head!
And she called him "Hero," and her papa to thank
Our wonderful Hector, just gave him the bank!
And the dear boy, of course, was quite swelled up with pride,
He decided that when he went home he would ride
In a brand-new tin Lizzie, so shiny and new
That his ma'd shriek with joy and the squire'd be blue!
So next day with his wife (Pearl had married our "Hec")
And with greenbacks and quarters piled up to his neck,
Behold our hero as happy as Rover,
And behind him they're bringing the money left over.
In a very short while you shall see how the boy
Came again to his home, bringing gladness and joy.

(Scene III. Back in Dunbar)

In the meantime at home in the town of Dunbar
'Twas a terrible day for our hero's poor ma,
For the mortgage was due, and the squire and his son
Had come over as soon as their breakfast was done
To demand that the widow fork over the dough
With the interest, whether she had it or no!
And the squire, he ranted, and tore, and cavorted,
"Gimme, gimme the money this minute!" he snorted!
And Cecil stood nearby and grinned with delight,
And the widow she wept till her eyes were a sight.
And I can't say what terrible thing might have been
The fate of the poor sobbing woman, but then—
A bump and a thump on the front porch, and there
Stood our hero himself with an Andy Gump air!
And he pulled out the cash just as if it were water!
From this pocket a nickel—from that one a quarter!
And the dollars and fifty-cent pieces galore
Fell in every direction all over the floor!
And while H. Hector's ma became puffed up with joy
The squire shrank to the size of a ten-year-old boy!
"Take your filthy old lucre!" "Hec" said to Squire Squeeze,
"And step out of this house and go hang yourself, please."
As he looked Cecil o'er from his toes to his head,
In a tone like old John D. himself, Hector said,

"I have seen all the trousers in New York this fall,
And mine are the bell-bottomest ones of them all!"
At these words Cecil's knees they began to get weak,
And soon out of the doorway, he started to sneak,
And the two of them vanished, and nobody knew
Where the old Squire Squeeze and young Cecil went to.
But our noble hero, bless his virtuous heart,
Although life was a struggle for him at the start,
Just because he'd a spirit that nothing could daunt,
Got a wife and a million—what more could he want! E. T.

Is surely an adding machine.

BLANK VERSE
(Very blank)

In my hand I had balloons,
Red balloons,
Blue balloons,
Balloons of yellow,
Vari-colored and rubber.
I let them go,
But what?
They do not float off.
Like cinders from a smoke-stack
They drop suddenly
To the ground
Like showers of plum fruit.
Now I see it all,
As I see the bottom of the bowl
When the stew is eaten!
Now I see it all—
I see why they dropped
Rubber balloons.
I forgot to blow them up!
How careless of me!
